ment to Admiral Porter. The torpedo was to be exploded by the breaking of the electric circuit. Edes had the deadly missile in his lap, while Spalding was rowing the launch. The tide was low, and the torpedo was planted in about three fathoms water. Near by was the remainder of the class under instruction, on board.

Admiral Porter, Cap ain Selfridge, and the officers of the torpedo station were on Goat Island, where the torpedo station were on Goat Island, where the torpedo station is located, for the purpose of witnessing the experiment. Edes leaned forward to arrange the apparatus in the water, when a loud noise and explosion were heard, and the bodies of the unfortunate men were seen in the air. The bodies went into the
